

The Gender Lens

Successfully engaging women through smart financial services marketing

The opportunity

Women now control 40%¹ of the world's wealth. In recent years, they have also taken command of the majority of household financial decisions and their influence within business is growing with more than one quarter of companies in the UK now owned by females². So, it shouldn't come as a surprise to any financial services (FS) marketer that women are worthy of serious marketing spend. What remains elusive, however, is knowing how to market to women effectively.

Part of the challenge is that the FS sector has been slow to recognise the potential of women as buyers. In fact, they have largely been ignored, excluded and even alienated from advertising and communications from banks, investment and wealth brands.

But now is the time for FS firms to take a closer look at how they market to women.

There are a lot of questions to consider before launching a campaign targeted at female investors. For example, do men and women actually think, act and feel differently when it comes to managing their finances? Do they have different attitudes towards investment risk? And if so, should brands communicate differently and create unique content for women – or is there a danger of this being seen as patronising?

Our methodology

To explore answers to these questions, and to better understand gender representation within the wealth and investment sector, Editions Financial decided to conduct proprietary research into this topic and undertook qualitative interviews with High Net Worth female investors, a female CMO in one of the world's leading financial institutions and a female IFA. Our research explored whether there is a need for investment and wealth brands to communicate differently with women. It also identified a number of lessons that can be learned about the right, and wrong, ways of doing this.

Successful businesswomen and independently wealthy women have been asked ‘what does your husband think?’ about their investment choices.

¹ Source: <https://www.credit-suisse.com/about-us-news/en/articles/news-and-expertise/global-wealth-report-2018-women-hold-40-percent-of-global-wealth-201810.html>

² Source: <https://www.finder.com/uk/business-owners-uk>

Key findings

- There is a distinct lack of inspiring, emotive and authentic FS marketing campaigns aimed at women. This represents a significant opportunity for smart marketers.
- Unconscious bias and sexism is detrimental to investment firms' relationships with women.
- The lack of female investment advisers and relationship managers in the industry is a significant roadblock to effective communication with women.
- It's time for a refresh in the way FS brands engage with women.
- Women do not see themselves as having less confidence in their investment decisions than men. Brands should stop patronising female investors.
- There are a number of different ways to connect with women: through online communities, events, leveraging the family theme, or championing female empowerment, for example. But not all women are the same. They should not be lumped into a single persona.
- Targeting women needs to become part of FS firms' DNA, not a tick-box exercise or a one-off push towards equality.

“Women do not see themselves as having less confidence in their investment decisions than men.”

The deep dive

Sexism bubbles beneath the surface

Encouragingly, our research did not encounter any immediate explicit personal experiences of sexism in the investment and wealth industry.

Nevertheless, there were numerous instances of implicit sexism and bias towards women. Even obviously successful businesswomen and independently wealthy women have been asked ‘What does your husband think?’ about their investment choices.

And while no adverts or communications were specifically criticised for their misrepresentation of women, equally none were praised. All of the inspiring examples of how women are portrayed in communications came from outside the finance category.

None of the research participants felt financial brands’ adverts or communications ‘represented me’. In fact, the vast majority of investment and wealth communications were said to feature or appeal to: “Staid men in suits in corporate settings who have hobbies like golf, whisky and yachting... in terms of marketing it’s been done to death and nothing has changed in decades.” Female IFA.

Of course, marketers for brands using campaigns featuring these ‘traditional’ themes and personas could argue that they are simply targeting a male client base nearing retirement that actually has those kinds of interests.

However, these depictions feel outdated and clichéd even in the way that they are trying to engage men, let alone whether there is any intention to connect with a female audience or not.

There was a strong desire among our female HNW audience for a ‘refresh’ in the way that wealth brands approach women, and the types of products and services that they offer them. In marketing and communication terms: “Women are an underserved market” Female CMO.

“Staid men in suits in corporate settings who have hobbies like golf, whisky and yachting... in terms of marketing it’s been done to death and nothing has changed in decades.”

—Female IFA

The first and most obvious observation for marketers is that ‘women should not be treated as a single persona’. Addressing half of your potential target audience in such a blanket fashion is likely to be as ineffective as targeting all ‘millennials’ or ‘retirees’, for example.

Attitudinal differences

But how different are men and women in the way they approach investing, and how might this impact marketing campaigns?

Attitudinally and behaviourally, a number of gender stereotypes exist within the media, with women generally perceived as being: better budgeters, more inclined to do extensive research around bigger financial and investment decisions, and more risk averse.

Somewhat surprisingly, our female HNW audience felt there was, in fact, a kernel of truth in some of these gender clichés. However, our interviewees disagreed as to whether there was a difference in financial confidence levels between men and women.

³ <http://www2.kantar.com/1/208642/2017-10-03/6cj9z>

‘Winning Over Women’ a report published by the global research agency Kantar, explores women’s experiences within FS. It shows that women are more likely to self-identify as having lower confidence. Sixty-five per cent of women compared with 55% of men stated they had low confidence when it comes to financial matters³.

While this difference may well exist in a quantitative sense, it failed to resonate with our female High Net Worth audience who saw confidence issues being primarily driven by personality, rather than gender.

As a result, attempting to demystify the complexity, jargon and intimidation factor associated with the investment sector, could represent a fertile opportunity to bring both under-confident men and women onboard.

Relationships matter

Our research suggests that women are more receptive to advice and developing relationships with advisers and financial brands than men.

Insights

- Between 2010 and 2015 private wealth held by women grew from $34trn to $51trn. By 2020 women are expected to hold $72trn, 32% of total global wealth⁴.
- Women tend to focus on longer-term investment goals. They also tend to be inspired more than men by non-monetary considerations such as security, independence or improving their lifestyle⁵.
- By the age of 60-64, women in the UK have an average pension wealth of £35,700, which is just 25% of the amount held by the average man⁶.
- Women trade shares 49% less frequently than men meaning they incur fewer trading costs⁷.

⁴ <https://www.economist.com/finance-and-economics/2018/03/08/investment-by-women-and-in-them-is-growing>

⁵ <https://www.hsbcpriatebank.com/en/discover/news-room/2018/women-men-invest>

⁶ <https://www.ft.com/content/2e77b322-fd0c-11e7-9bfc-052cbba03425>

⁷ <https://www.investmentweek.co.uk/investment-week/news/3026206/women-outperform-investing-hargreaves-lansdown>

“I don’t think women need a different proposition in private banking... it’s really just a case of how we position and communicate with them via relationship managers.” Female CMO.

Our HNW women had no ‘pride issues’ in asking for help and seeking collaboration with advisers and brands around financial decision-making. This means that advisers create a different style of relationship with their female clients. What’s more, female advisers tend to connect better with women.

“I have deeper relationships with my female clients – I’m more chatty, friendly and have broader conversations. Women just connect better with each other.” Female IFA.

So, while women might be ‘hard to win over’ in the initial stages of developing an investment relationship, they are likely to be ‘sticker’ clients and pay greater attention to advice in the long term.

Another challenge facing the sector, however, is the lack of female advisers. This is more noticeable in some countries than others, but it certainly has an impact. Research from Canada suggests that 87% of women are unable to find a financial adviser they can really connect with. Unsurprisingly, 86% of financial advisers in Canada are white men!⁸

Likewise, all of the female HNW clients we spoke to described an ‘arm’s length’ relationship with their current relationship manager – whereby the client limits the frequency and nature of interactions, particularly with banking relationship managers (as opposed to IFAs).

“If I need something, I’ll go to my adviser. I control the relationship. I ask for the information I need in order to make a decision. I respect their expertise, but I also understand their motives.” Female HNW.

The key to closing this gap for a more value-adding relationship with clients may be to exploit the human touch.

Women who feel their adviser do not understand them

⁸ <http://www.etfcm.com/womenmoney/includewadvisors-failing-woman.pdf>

“What sets the really successful in-demand relationship managers apart? Empathy. They are consistently compassionate, engaging and friendly. Clients have to be comfortable opening up to them. Because when you talk about family wealth in particular, it’s almost like you need to be a counsellor.” CMO.

So, do these subtle differences and nuances mean that FS brands should come up with a distinct proposition for targeting women? And if so, what’s the best way to build empathy and a human connection at a brand level?

Different approaches to targeting women

Financial brands are currently adopting a few different techniques when targeting women. Through our research, we explored which of these methodologies resonated most with our female audience.

Feminism and/or female empowerment

A number of US brands have explicitly targeted women with an overt feminist stance, for example:

- Ellevest – an investment platform that uses an algorithm tailored specifically to women’s incomes and life goals.
- Helm – a venture investing company created to ‘rethink how people invest in women.’

Both organisations have brands consciously designed to target women and use visual imagery similar to glossy, upmarket lifestyle magazines, which really spoke to our HNW women. That said, the overt feminist agenda, particularly with Helm, felt to our participants like too much of a step change away from traditional mainstream financial service institutions.

There is a very delicate balance to be struck when using campaigns accentuating female empowerment. Get it right and you inspire and create a sense of aspiration. Get it wrong and you become a controversial niche.

A well-executed sense of ‘glamour’ and exclusivity is likely to appeal; but being seen as too glossy and using catwalk models is likely to disconnect.

... emphasising women as being time-poor, hassled and looking for more help to navigate their responsibilities feels distinctly uninspiring for upmarket brands in the wealth and investment space.

Featuring inspiring female business leaders who showcase their real-life stories and ‘rise to the top’ is likely to provide powerful emotional content. However, stock footage of businesswomen can come across as: “Pushy women with 80s shoulder pads who are more macho and aggressive than their male counterparts.” Female IFA.

Family

Women are often featured in communications as busy, time-poor jugglers of the many demands made on them by their career and family. This is a familiar advertising theme across a wide range of industry categories, and can be executed in a smart, non- patronising way.

It could be highly relevant in FS too, since men and women are seemingly motivated by different investment goals and returns. The Kantar report, for instance, indicated that men are more motivated by return and personal gain, whereas women are much more family and legacy orientated in their investment priorities⁹.

This leaning towards family and legacy could then segue into topics such as retirement and succession/ inheritance planning.

However, many would argue that the ‘nuclear family’ is becoming less and less of an appropriate way to market to anyone. As such, using family as shorthand for women is likely to feel clichéd and trite. Moreover, emphasising women as being time-poor, hassled and looking for more help to navigate their responsibilities feels distinctly uninspiring for upmarket brands in the wealth and investment space.

Tricky circumstances

The juxtaposition to a traditional ‘nuclear family’ is what is referred to in the US as ‘tricky circumstances’, which is a catch-all term for life events such as separation, divorce or the death of a partner. These circumstances often necessitate women taking greater control of their finances.

Brands such as Wealthcare For Women specifically target this lifestage and use an empathetic, down-to-earth tone of voice to emotionally connect with their audience:

Many would argue that the ‘nuclear family’ is becoming less and less of an appropriate way to market to anyone.

⁹ <http://www2.kantar.com/1/208642/2017-10-03/6cj9z>

“Let’s forget revenge, and just agree that living well is the best. Whether that means ordering the good white Burgundy, taking your college-aged kids to Tuscany, or just having the housekeeper an extra day a week, being able to treat yourself makes any hardship easier.” Wealthcare For Women website.

Such an overt and niche positioning feels less palatable for a UK-centric mainstream FS brand, but the imagery, language and tone of voice provide some clear pointers as to how to create an emotional connection with your target audience.

A sense of community

Elsewhere, a handful of FS providers are building online communities specifically for HNW women.

- UBS Unique offers an advisory board – “A collective of business leaders and ‘philanthropists who provide insights and guidance to women on how to make financial know-how more accessible’. This feeds into an online community where women can come together to discuss wealth and investments.”

- Westpac in Australia has the Ruby Connection – “An interactive online community designed to inspire, educate and connect with women.”

Our participants had attended a number of conferences, seminars and networking events specifically aimed at women. The desire to share and communicate is a fundamental human need and one that is felt particularly keenly by women.

Traditional in-person networking events can be expensive to produce, however. The events and marketing teams will need to be confident that they can deliver viable financial returns on investment before budgets are signed off.

By contrast, a well-run and moderated online community is ‘always on’ and has the potential to become self-sustaining.

When the two tactics are combined, the offline events become a focal point – something to look forward to, a moment in the year when the community can meet in person, as well as an engine of content to fuel the conversations online. So, a multi-channel approach can be worth the investment.

The desire to share and communicate is a fundamental human need and one that is felt particularly keenly by women.

De-gendering

In what might be seen as a rather bold move, a few relatively new FS entrants have decided to ‘take gender out’ of the equation:

- Starling Bank – make money equal – which argues that money is genderless and the media should stop speaking to men and women differently about it.
- Nutmeg – which prides itself on having eliminated all the off-putting aspects of the traditional investment industry by empowering, not diminishing, its prospective customers. By simplifying the language and jargon around investments and the use of cartoons in advertising, Nutmeg has neatly avoided any gender stereotypes.

Whether consciously or unconsciously, these brands are still targeting women since they are being inclusive rather than exclusive. The result is that they have been very successful in attracting a large female client base.

The path ahead

How investment and wealth brands target women depends on a number of complex, intertwining factors relating to wider brand values, strategic business objectives, existing client bases, human capital – and marketing nous.

What’s clear, however, is that to simply ignore women as a target audience is at best a missed opportunity and at worst a potential PR/reputational disaster in the current climate of gender relations.

And even if your brand is striving to be inclusive and already connecting with women, there is still a need for careful auditing and evaluation of your current branding, communications and marketing materials. This will enable you to determine what types of bias and assumptions implicitly exist within your content.

Of course, if your team isn’t inclusive and diverse you may face an even tougher challenge. Men who surround themselves with other men are unlikely to produce content that inspires, engages and builds relationships with prospective female clients.

Taking all of this into account, our top piece of advice at Editions Financial would be that if your brand is keen to attract female investors then it must walk the walk, as well as talk the talk. Paying lip service to gender issues and equality could be more problematic than doing nothing.

Developing a gender strategy

We would recommend the following 10 step toolkit to develop a gender-inclusive FS marketing strategy.

- 01. Audit your brand's content – Review your existing content for bias, stereotypes and clichéd gender representation. Ask yourself some tough questions around whether your marketing is guilty of just being aimed at 'staid men in suits in corporate settings who have hobbies like golf, whisky and yachting.'
- 02. Review the competitor landscape – What can you learn from what your competitors are doing around gender? If they are taking steps to 'refresh' their approach, is there a danger of your brand being left behind?
- 03. Get some real insight from women – Talk to your female customer base and prospective clients. Explore their satisfaction levels with your current service, communications and marketing materials. Are you meeting their needs?
- 04. Evaluate your brand's tone of voice – How appropriate is the tone of voice that you are using within your communications? Are you producing content that feels inclusive? Part of this re-evaluation will mean looking at the balance of female writers and thought leaders you're promoting.

05. Avoid the clichés and stereotypes – Think about inspiring ad campaigns from other sectors and how they portray authentic, genuine and relatable women. Although there is no a silver bullet in terms of the most appropriate themes and topics to target women within FS, our review of different brands approaches suggests a number of fertile territories:

- Aspirational – Wealth and investment brands should convey a sense of prestige and exclusivity. But avoid using fashion models and overly stylised depictions of ‘perfect women’.
- Entrepreneurs – Inspirational business figures with compelling real-life stories can provide captivating content. But stock image of ‘harsh’ business women won’t. Lose the shoulder pads!
- Family – This is undoubtedly an opportunity to emotionally connect with some women. Again, though, we would caution against the clichés of portraying women as time-poor harassed mothers, wives and business women.

- 06. Review your adviser relationships and sales material – Are you doing enough internally and externally within your sales channels to eliminate gender issues? Are you highlighting biases and ingrained behaviours that could impact upon the service provided to women? Are you doing enough to empower and equip frontline staff?
- 07. Create a distinctive content proposition to target women – Combining the learnings from your insights, competitor analysis and brand auditing should help identify the most appropriate way to target women. It’s then a case of translating your overarching brand values into a ‘content first’ campaign proposition. Map out the customer engagement journey across all the different touchpoints and draw up a content calendar.

- 08. Create compelling content – Focus on media-rich assets that engage women across digital, social and mobile. There are a wide range of formats including editorial, video, infographic/ motion graphic, podcasts and webinar, events. It is critical to pick the right one to impart your message.
- 09. Activate accordingly – Ensure your distribution is targeted across the most appropriate digital and social channels – for example .com, social, native, Ecomm, media partnerships. A mix of channels will ensure greater engagement.
- 10. Test and learn – Optimise, innovate and scale according to how well your content performs. Measure this using Google Analytics, A/B testing and social performance. And keep in mind that if you want the viewpoint of your female clients and prospects, seek it out at regular intervals.

Ready to talk?

Who we are

Editions Financial is the UK's only content marketing agency dedicated to finance. For 20 years, we've created content for the world's leading financial services organisations, helping marketers send the right messages to the right audiences at the right time. In the past four years alone, we've successfully delivered more than 3,000 content projects for leading global financial brands.

We can help you

Brands that pay the closest attention to how varied audience segments think and feel about their finances and use content to address their needs effectively are in the best position to benefit from their value. If you're looking for insight-rich, purpose-led, high-impact content that gets results, please get in touch.

Meanwhile, why not take a look at our showreel and find out more about how we help brands like yours better connect with their audiences.

Contact

Tony Dickson

Business Development manager

tony.dickson@editionsfinancial.com

0203 911 7530

Follow us

editionsfinancial.com

